Problem and solution sample answer

Art is turned as a cultural identity of every nation across the world. However, many people pay more attention to the development of the science, technology and business related streams than arts. In this essay, I will discuss the reason for the change in preference and the ways to convert them to get an interest towards the arts.

The first and foremost reason for this change in trend is because of the lack of job opportunities for the people choosing arts as their career. In brief, throughout the generations, artistry is considered as a hobby instead of a professional job which has many employment opportunities to make an income out of it. For example, the fine art cultures such as painting, dancing, and music are treated as a hobby that individuals perform by learning for fun after office hours or on weekends to relax and relieve their stress. Thus, this makes the artistic skills have less demand in the job market.

The only solution to increase the people's interest towards the arts is by increasing the awareness towards the arts among youth by the government. Creating stage shows about the various types of art forms and attracting the people will be a great way to persuade the people. Also, the government can pay the artists higher pay and job opportunities which in turn elevates the job market and attracts more people. For instance, there is an exhibition held in Paris to elevate the artist, which makes one of my friends participate in it and as a result he got an award. This recognition made him start an online coaching class and thus he gained income for survival.

In conclusion, despite making art as a cultural symbol, many people prefer choosing their career in the streams of science, technology and other not arts. The major reason for this scenario is because of the lack of the expected job opportunities in the market. Hence, to resolve this, the government needs to take action and provide awareness among the people and boost their interest towards the arts.
