Modern technology has undoubtedly definitely made learning easier and better. Most children's parents encourage them to watch shows to gain information and acquire new knowledge. While I agree that seeing television has some positive effects on a child, I believe this trend has a more detrimental effect on our children and society in general.

First and foremost, seeing television can have some positive effects on children. There are, in fact, considerable advantages to incorporating television into homes and educational institutions. Many informative broadcasters, like National Geographic and Discovery, exist solely for educational reasons. Moreover, viewing television may increase the concentration and attention of some people. For instance, children with autism and behaviour problems have a concentration weakness; research has demonstrated that these children have enhanced their focus and concentration and are capable of watching television for prolonged periods. Therefore, it is obvious that somehow this trend has some beneficial consequences.

Similarly, I believe that watching television has several negative adverse effects. Spending time watching television can divert attention from healthy pastimes like outdoor activity with colleagues, leading to weight gain and feelings of loneliness. In addition, some programmes are created for entertainment, not teaching; these programmes have violent scenes and inappropriate terminology, which hurt children's brains. In addition, prolonged watching television may prevent reading a book and informative articles. Consequently, children would lack intellectual and problem-solving abilities. The negative impacts of television on the psychological and physical well-being of children can be determined.

In summation, I believe that television watching has more drawbacks than benefits. Under the supervision of both their parents and educators, children may spend more time watching purely for informative and educational reasons.

Nowadays, Television sets are now utilized as an educational tool. Many people believe that teenagers can absorb more efficiently while watching television. I fully agree with the concept that television might benefit youngsters in increasing their knowledge. This essay will look into the theoretical value of particular television networks for students.

I feel that television is incredibly good for youngsters for two primary reasons. First, kids have access to a plethora of informative television channels, such as National Geographic and discovery, which are quite captivating to watch. This option might, in my opinion, considerably expand students' understanding of Biology and Geography. Another consideration is that watching television helps reduce the school-related anxiety that teenagers are prone to. If, for instance, a youngster receives a poor grade in a specific subject, classmates would likely tease him or her. Consequently, I would suggest that televisions may be advantageous in some instances. It is evident that, by viewing the news on television, students receive a significant amount of information and learn about the world's various cultures and critical problems.

In contrast, I feel that we should not push youngsters to watch television constantly because it makes them less productive and active. Moreover, numerous studies have already demonstrated that televisions not only make individuals idle but also overweight. I believe that many schools offer physical education classes, even though television can make children less active.

In summation, although it is obvious that televisions make an individual less active, I am convinced that teenagers learn more efficiently while watching television, for the reasons I have explained throughout.

In this 21st century, digitalization has replaced all the old-schooled theories in educational institutes. Moreover, it is claimed that teenagers can effectively study while watching television at home and school. Although I agree that youngsters sometimes can learn from watching television, I do not consider it to be a good idea to encourage this activity.

Firstly, children's study is occasionally enhanced by television viewing. Numerous television programmes provide visual information and tales that enhance the process of learning interesting as well as the content easier to understand. It is a good way to encourage students to learn, particularly when they are tired of academics and assignments. Some applications, for instance, present appealing stories of literature, so enhancing children's comprehension. These tools also make it simpler for youngsters to memorize poetry, as it is challenging and tiring for young children to remember poetry by continuously repeating them.

In contrast, I believe that heavy watching television may damage a child's academic performance. First, television programmes can serve as a distraction from their academics, especially when they are unattended. Some programmes employ games to assist youngsters to learn more efficiently, yet youngsters may become more involved in the pleasure and so acquire little. Furthermore, continuous TV viewing alone could lead to an absence of human engagement. If children have queries while watching the television, their instructors cannot immediately address them, which would be most likely to lead to misunderstandings.

To conclude, even though viewing television encourages children to take an interest in learning, I believe that youngsters should not consume too much television because it has a negative consequence on their academics.

Whenever children are watching the relevant content for a specified period of time each and every day, television can serve as a valuable tool for learning. Although the opinion of some who believe viewing television is a waste of money and time, I feel that it can be an extremely beneficial educational tool for students, and so they should be enabled to do so both at home and at school, under the observation of both parents and educators.

Although if I am no more a school-aged child. However, my younger brother, a college student specializing in history, totally relies on Discovery Channel documentaries to increase his knowledge of history. The audio-visual portrayal of an event, story, or information on television has a long-term effect on our minds. If the proper content is selected for a child, he or she will gain knowledge more quickly by watching television.

In contrast, those who believe that television shows are a waste of time have their own arguments. Individuals have no control over the time they devote to watching television. Furthermore, many television programmes are inappropriate for children and can have adverse effects on their underdeveloped minds. In many instances, they can replicate the negative qualities of their beloved characters and then become violent. However, this can only be possible when we possess no supervision over our child's behaviour.

To sum up, as parents and educators, we must choose suitable and informative activities for our children both at school and at home. I believe that the use of television in schools for both instructional and leisure activities should be legalized, as it is an effective teaching resource.
