It is undoubtedly true that traits define the personality of a person and compasses him to develop and nourish. There is still an ongoing debate about whether competitiveness is a positive or negative quality for one to acquire, nevertheless we will discuss both sides of this attribute. The sentiment of competition motivates the person to evolve to his optimum level and succeed. However, it can gradually affect the corporeal and intellectual health of individuals.

Competitiveness accentuates many inner potentials and confidence in people and keeps motivating them to pursue their goals. Furthermore, the sense of combat and surpassing other people to become the highest person in the room acts as a catalyst to achieve their ambitions. Indisputably, one constantly tries to improvise and to be more fierce than others in the awe of competition. Additionally, human beings are in a consistent state of learning and adapting in cut-throat circumstances. Likewise, this optimistic quality is constructive in the contemporary and ruthless world which will lead to a successful and comforting career or life in the future.

On the contrary, there are underlying effects of this character that one does not recognize on their own because of their utmost focus on competing but proves to be atrocious for one's body and mind. Admittedly, self-centered nature can deteriorate the personal and deep relationships needed in a brutal and cold world. The continual expenditure of energy by observing and comparing oneself with others causes physiological and psychological disorders which are the most prominent causes of this feature.

To recapitulate, any facet with proper acknowledgment and boundaries is efficacious for mankind. Competitiveness surely brings out the obligatory and paramount attributes needed in life but we should not trivialize its effect in life which is obstructive.

In today's monotonous and abstruse world, competition has been an indispensable part of every individual's life. To obtain anything a person has to fight for it, consequently competitiveness became a prime feature one should possess for survival. Mostly this spirit brings out positive results for people. For detailed elaboration, we will discuss the pragmatic aspects of this specific trait.

To begin with, competitiveness encourages a person to push through their limits and become the best among others. However, utilizing this facet depends on the type of person whether it will be a boon or doom for mankind. Furthermore, by cultivating this attribute, residents become more active which leads to advancements and innovation. Certainly, competitiveness has an extensive impact on personal and professional life too. Workers outperform each other to convey their work to higher authorities. For instance, the perception of tussles might improve a student's academic performance and motivate them to work harder. A competitive personality makes a person tough and less prone to give up in the face of failure.

On the other hand, there are a few cynical effects of competition such as the constant need to outperform everyone one eventually lacks the notion of teamwork, which will be detrimental to any foundation. In order to be competitive, one acquires selfish nature and mislays cooperative behavior and rudimentary humanity. Particularly, an intense level of competition in an organization originated by highly fierce employees can create an unhealthy work environment. This type of atmosphere does not promote productivity but makes few wage-earners feel unbearable working together.

To summarize, competitiveness is an effective trend since it generates productive outcomes in every sphere of life but it completely relies on the paradigm of humans to use it wisely and accordingly.

Competitiveness is a positive quality for people in most societies - Band 7 IELTS model essay

The modern society comprises of progressing contributions of many great individuals. One of the reasons for this expansion is the competitive human nature. In my opinion, being competitive has a vital influence on many people's lives, which can be both beneficial and harmful in certain affairs.

The merciless behavior of the clan has paralyzed the social life of humans. People pay more attention to their future than the life they are currently living in. Youth is sacrificing their enjoyment for the sake of a career. Irrefutably, balanced life in all disciplines can bring happiness to civilization. The population should work hard to muster their desires but not at the cost of their substantial well-being. Ambitious individuals are conceited as a result, the people around them, such as at workplaces and other private matters can come into conflict for any matter, since they have a tendency of not showing any compromising attitude towards them. Moreover, too much competition means creating an uncomfortable situation in job places, since aggressive person always tries to portray their haughtiness in their work at offices instead of cordial nature towards colleagues.

A vying environment can either inspire a person or daunt him. A student can opt to learn actively or passively in a contentious condition, depending on how they consider their future. If they are thinking in a pessimistic way, they might be accepting the situation and do nothing valuable to create a revolution. Therefore, the power of competitiveness on an individual can vary, in obedience to the genre of a person.

In conclusion, competition guides people in various ways though, I strongly believe that instead of eluding it, we should seize it with proper accordance. Only in this way, we can live our favorable life without any severe consequences due to excessive competitiveness.

There is no denying that competitiveness help citizens be more fierce and aspiring. It is prominent excellence for people in most tribes if they use it in a rational way but it can be a threatening trend if people overestimate it. So I think competitiveness affects individuals in vivid ways.

Firstly, Being keen can be a beneficial attribute in many other instances. Competitive people always strive to be better than other people, and they usually persevere unless they achieve their goals. To exemplify, a sentiment of rivalry can boost a student's study performance and encourage them to score better marks than others. People with combative personalities are resilient and unlikely to give up when faced with setbacks. Furthermore, many ruthless people are often competing against themselves and always putting themselves in a zen mode of learning so they can acquire superior results.

Secondly, With the help of overpowered and enthusiastic people, the companies will obviously be boosted in economic growth in the long run. For instance, companies that relate to sales, marketing, or more are the highest-pressure working environment and the workers who compete are also the one that has high-pressure resistance. As a result, they can work without losing working productivity which is advantageous both to the institution and the employees.

To summarize, competitiveness is a positive trend and is an ability that everybody needs, to gain greater job opportunities in the future. We should compete with individuals, and professionals, but also keep in mind humanity and caring nature for all. I believe that positive competition should be encouraged while the destructive one should be discarded from our life.
