One of the most perplexing societal issues in the contemporary world is crime. I vehemently disagree with the claim made by some that there is no viable solution to this problem. The essay that follows will outline my viewpoint and look at practical ways to reduce crime.

Crime is a result of the situation. Nobody is a criminal by birth. Society must carefully examine the conditions that breed criminals and work to prevent them. For instance, a person often commits an offense because something is subpar. Therefore, if the government provided for a person's fundamental requirements, such as quality health care, housing, and tertiary education, among other things, the incidences of robbery or other worsening antisocial behavior would be drastically reduced.

The emergence of new technology has made it simpler to proactively monitor criminal activity and stop it before it happens. In other words, since much of this equipment and gadgets can capture video from everywhere at real-time, they have significantly enhanced the surveillance process in police offices. As an example, traffic cameras that capture unlawful behavior and aid in the identification of offenders are one of the best ways to stop drivers who violate the law by driving faster than the posted speed limit. As a consequence, the number of automobile accidents worldwide has significantly decreased during the last few years.

As a result, we are all too aware of this urgent issue of crime. There is a belief that crime cannot be prevented. However, I firmly think that there are several practical answers to this issue, such as governments' support of the death penalty and the use of contemporary technology for proactive surveillance.

In today's climate, criminality is unstoppable. Previously, individuals feared punishment, so few participated. Committing a crime isn't a huge issue in the contemporary world. This horrific act is celebrated. So they exhibit social power. Due to misperceptions, incidents have grown in recent years.

After witnessing the 2012 Nirbahaya rape, I understood that hostility and anger can push anybody over the line. After being assaulted and violated, she cannot be able to talk. Mentally tormented, not psychically. Despite their cynicism, they were innocent. This type of behavior is risky. If this continues, individuals will become aggressive and dangerous, which legislation cannot stop. Teenagers are now brazen and opinionated. They often steal. To satisfy their demands, individuals develop bad behaviors that might ruin their lives. In a sense, such individuals can do no wrong.

Every action elicits a reaction that is equal and opposite in kind. The rape case and subsequent demonstrations in Nirbahaya in 2012 affected everyone. It had a profound effect on the system. Nevertheless, the sufferer emerged victorious in the end. The nation commended her for her justice. If you are unable to persuade them to change their minds, you will need to find other methods to make them feel awful. Sanctions for mental torture have to be included in the constitution so that everyone is aware of what others go through.

Even if these circumstances cannot be controlled, laws and regulations must be followed. These instances are closely monitored. Different sites have CCTV cameras. Regular patrols discourage unlawful activity. Human rights and safety regulations should be constantly updated.

Across the globe, crime has become more prevalent in the modern era. As a result, some believe that there are no methods to stop criminal activity. This is a viewpoint with which I strongly disagree, since I feel there are possible answers to this issue.

As a first step, the government may use a variety of smart and effective measures, such as imposing harsher jail terms or even the death penalty on criminals. People are more likely to refrain from criminal activity if they are aware of the harsh consequences that await those who do, as seen by the effectiveness of these effective treatments. Since governments have enforced harsher and longer jail terms on malefactors in recent years, studies have found that the number of wrongdoers has fallen. As a result, governments would be unable to address this issue if urgent measures to combat criminals were not in place.

On the other hand, the vast majority of individuals engage in government in order to reduce crime and protect their communities. Many people would think it was impossible for individuals to safeguard society against crime. People form the society, and it is our job to work with the government to keep crime in our community and protect our children from its most terrible and abhorrent manifestations. It's not simple, but we have to figure out a way to make it happen.

The bottom line is that in order to live in a society free of crime, everyone in that society must do their part. This includes governments and the general public.

It is true that criminal activity has had a devastating effect on the world, and many people believe that it is impossible to stop it. In my opinion, this problem can be solved with the help of both government assistance and education. In this essay, I will formulate several ideas to prevent the crimes that are happening in the world.

Lack of parental supervision and instruction is often blamed for the rise in crime. Parents should focus on developing a child's morals in their formative years to reduce unlawful behavior in the future. Mothers or fathers teach children right from wrong, making them aware of their actions. More parental care reduces irresponsible behavior. A child who doesn't receive enough care and sharing from his family is more likely to commit a crime than one who does.

Poverty is usually to blame for crimes, and this is thought to be very difficult to resolve. National and international leaders could, however, address this issue by helping those in need. To be more precise, it is suggested that local governments allocate more funds to providing food and clothing to the poor, which will raise people's living standards and, as a result, significantly lower crime rates. Regarding international organizations, less developed nations could benefit from technological advancements, medical advances, or the expertise of developing nations.

Therefore, less fortunate nations can take advantage of such significant assistance to significantly improve their homes, reducing the likelihood of crime. In conclusion, I believe that, despite the presence of crime, this problem could be resolved with the assistance of a loving family and the police.
