1. According to you, what will schools be like in the future?

Answer: Schools of the future will function more like community centres where kids can come to learn about any topic they're interested in. No longer will students be confined to a single time and place for instruction; instead, they will be free to learn at their own convenience.

2. Can the students in your country choose their favourite subjects?

Answer: When picking subjects, there is typically some degree of choice involved; however, the available alternatives may be restricted based on the institution and what is made available.

3. Do you think students should choose subjects they like?

Answer: It really is dependent on the personality, interests, and aspirations of the specific student. It's possible that some pupils will do better in school if they study things they're interested in, while others will do better if they tackle subjects that present more of a challenge. The ultimate responsibility for determining the most fruitful method rests with the learner.

4. What do students do after school in your country?

Answer: After school, most of the children in my nation return to their homes. While it's possible that some children will participate in after-school activities like sports or clubs, the vast majority of pupils will head home.

5. What courses/subjects will be helpful in future work?

Answer: The following are examples of disciplines and degrees that will prove useful in a professional setting in the future for the students: Computer Science, Information Technology, Web Development, Graphic Design, Marketing, Sales.
