The advancement of third-world countries is feasible by appropriate underpinning. The first and foremost way is to procure aid from the administration of first world countries. However, this will swiftly settle several proceedings, eventually, I am in complete unison with such a viewpoint. My preference is justified further in the ensuing paragraphs with logical examples.

To begin with, wealthy countries have a moral obligation to help underprivileged people, which is one of the reasons. Developed countries help people only when neighboring countries are suffering from health, education and trade issues. For example, you can contribute by building a school in a non-developed nation. One can also have the opportunity to send doctors and nurses to support their health standards. This allows administrations to secure stricter trade agreements to support the economies of developing countries. The world will become a better place when wealthy nations fulfill their promises and make fair contributions.

Moreover, the vast majority of third-world countries in this day and age have historically prepared at the expense of developing countries. This is another reason why developed nations need to support developing nations. For an instance, popular European countries once illegally searched for gold and diamond deposits in Africa. As a result of this, it would only be correct to support the educational needs of these countries by awarding scholarships to the right students. In addition to this, funding may be provided to help improve healthcare systems and seminars held to educate business owners in developing nations.

In conclusion, it is clear that developing medical, educational, and business infrastructure is the only way to help poorer countries improve. Additionally, the guiding hand of welther nations can assist them in achieving their objective. It will not only speed up the process of progress but also it will help them discover their own route in order to survive.

In today's society, certain underdeveloped nations are struggling to promote the fundamental rights of residents, such as access to health care and education. Supporting the improvements in living standards in developed countries benefits society in many ways. My preference is explained in the following paragraph with appropriate examples.

To begin with, in the age of globalization, a country's happiness can offer the global economy. Therefore, rich countries should help poor countries to benefit. Firstly, rich countries should try to improve conditions in the world's public schools and hospitals. The construction of schools and hospitals will ensure the provision of essential needs for all. For example, schools and hospitals are in bad shape in all the third world areas of the world. Secondly, governments of rich countries can help improve education systems in developing countries. Developed nations often have well-equipped health care and education facilities employing highly qualified specialists. They have the ability to send teachers and doctors for training.

As an alternative, every government's duty is to look out for its own citizens. However, it might be exceedingly challenging for governments to quickly improve living circumstances without any outside help. For instance, nations can obtain loans. In addition to this, the administration should also use more funds on the development of the infrastructure rather than spending it more on the equipment for army officers, museums, and other sources and should focus more to uplift the nation.

In conclusion, I think that everyone should support one another. Additionally, allocating money to help may not have a substantial negative impact on the economy of a developed country while significantly enhancing lives in a different nation.

Some experts offer the suggestion that the wealthy nations of the world help the impoverished countries trade and commerce, health as well as in education. I am in complete unison with the viewpoint. My preference is justified further with reasons and examples.

The foremost argument to explain my opinion is, that the underdeveloped nations can be uplifted if the rich countries do some amount of business with them. The poor countries can improve their economies by selling raw materials to rich countries and by buying industrialized goods in return. India's economy was in the bracket of underdeveloped nations, it progressed by conducting expensive trade of wheat, potato, tea, spices, and other goods which has eventually made her one of the most promising developing nations. Additionally, the affluent countries can definitely support the need nations with education. They can donate computers, and books, help in building schools, train teachers and thus supporting for a long-term cause.

Conversely, some others counterclaim that, the poor countries are themselves responsible for their own progress and issues. They must manage the economy, and make appropriate efforts to improve the health and education sectors by taking loans from the world bank or the rich countries.

To culminate the discussion, it is commented that indeed the wealthy nations must help the poorer ones. The leaders of the industrialized nations play a decisive role in essential areas and help to make the world a better place. Where all have food, good health, and some income to remain happy.

The question of whether the rich should spend money on imports and exports, healthcare and education in less developed nations is one that is now being discussed in the public. As a result of this, the community needs these things to prosper in society. I truly believe, that the most powerful government must construct these facilities in developing countries. My preference is explain in the ensuing paragraphs.

First, wealthy countries helped them send the best medical professionals and educators to developing countries to highlight the key areas where these devices are in great need. Then they build a structure for them and provide access to their own area for local teachers and doctors. For example, health and education professionals in developed countries support and educate locals with the latest technology. As a result, the community can elect well-educated representatives, which benefits the economy of the developing region.

Secondly, wealthy countries should encourage multinational corporations invest in developing countries. For example, a successful commodity company has set up branches in these countries. This means that residents have the opportunity to work for a respected company. As a result, they may receive tips on how to grow their business. Therefore, the country's economic sector is helping the government launch groundbreaking projects there. However, some countries argue that poor countries themselves must make considerable efforts to expand their economies and bring advanced ways to their hometowns. They don't rely on others, and if something goes wrong in the future, they don't hesitate to work hard again for it.

To sum up, there's no doubt that developing countries will rise rapidly if they receive assistance. Even if they are left to their own devices, they would take far long. However, in my perception, a wealthy town should be handle poorer one.
