The condition of being kept in prison is the most conventional form of punishment, followed all across the globe. However, the majority of prisoners get caught in this terrible cycle. I concur that certain jurisdictions should be imposed and the case should be solved according to the severity of the crime.

To begin with, more than half of the crimes, have sanctions that profit the criminals. They get an opportunity to slip away from prison by paying the fine and therefore, leading to repeated attempts of misdemeanors. For example, the fine for theft is less than the amount stolen, which indirectly benefits the offenders. Moreover, there are several prisoners who have significantly strong contacts outside the jail. Carelessness and negligence of the police authorities may sometimes help the criminals to get in contact with outsiders and hence results in misfortunes.

In contrast, there are certain techniques that can be embraced to reduce the crime rate and bursting of offenders simultaneously. Cancellation of licenses or banning of a certain document can possibly play a major role in reducing misconduct. Also, convalescence can be adopted, which slowly and gradually changes the behavior of offenders. Furthermore, countries that follow a hierarchical rule should impose new rules and regulations that favor the citizens and also protects the individuals of the nation.

To conclude, there are certain privileges available for the criminals inside the lock-up, which should be eliminated. And there should be some positive development or retribution based on the gravity of the crime performed.

In most countries, imprisonment is the most common form of punishment that a court can impose. The majority of criminals flare up after being released from prison. I believe that many measures to condemn criminals behind bars are unsuccessful.

There are mainly two reasons why criminals end up in jail over and over again. Firstly, many prisoners do evil jobs in order to fulfill their fundamental needs. Many of the small offenders do theft or fraud to support their needs of food and shelter out of fragility and poverty. These poor people are not able to access educational resources and health care and therefore opt for burglary. Secondly, the criminals are not aware of the after consequences, the atmosphere inside lockup is not severe enough to make the offender understand their lawful mistake. As a result, they commit the same mistake a second time.

In spite of that, it is obvious that punishment cannot drop the crime rate, hence, it is imperative to make the convict comprehend the consequences of their actions and they should be sent to rehabilitation centers. In contrast, there are possibilities that some criminals do not change their behavior and therefore it is necessary to punish on the basis of the severity of the illegal act committed. Moreover, public safety should always be the first priority of the officials while punishing the offenders.

To conclude, it is apparent that many captives frequently find themselves behind bars. But there are some possible solutions to be implemented rather than the harsh ones, taking in mind the local residents of the nation.

Imprisonment is used as a form of punishment in every country of the world. It is well known that most criminals re-offend after being released from prison. I think that the rules are not partial and need to be rationalized.

Firstly, the harsh and careless attitude of prison guards toward the prisoners promotes a discouraging mindset. As a result, their behavior has no improvement. Additionally, they don't seek to learn any life lessons that could aid them in the future, soliciting people to commit crimes once more. Secondly, because jails are ineffective at imposing punishment, offenders do not take their punishment seriously. For instance, if a prisoner receives a sentence for only a limited period of time, he will return with a better plan and repeat the mistake.

However, there are some prisoners who realize their mistakes and they want to correct them, by either obtaining education or enrolling themselves in certain community services for prisoners who desire to lead decent lives, the prison should offer these educational opportunities. As it can also create influence in the head of other prisoners who live in the same atmosphere. Moreover, emphasizing and explaining the consequences of committing such crimes might help in rehabilitation because not all crimes are best solved by directly punishing the culprit.

In conclusion, it is evident that many prisoners relapse in jail. Yet, some of the causes of these actions can be identified, and certain measures must be made to put some rehabilitative instead of punishing remedies into place.

Most countries consider imprisonment a common form of punishment. Nevertheless, most offenders repeat the same crime after they've been released. I believe that the rules of jail should be updated since they are not fractional.

To begin with, there are no legislative terms in prison and hence, criminals are given some freedom to live in jail on their terms. This provides prisoners with comfort and even some sort of luxuries. For instance, lawbreakers are allowed to watch some kind of television programs, sports, and even listen to music. Some may even involved in fights and make the situation even worse. Moreover, some culprits have executed bigger offenses like murder, rapes, or others share the same cell with criminals who have committed smaller crimes. Offenders get influenced and the possibility of attempting new misdeeds in the near future increases.

However, not everyone should have the same punishment. The decision of punishment must depend on the type of illegal action executed but also should be irrespective of gender and age. If a criminal has committed a crime like theft or a cyber scam should be in the guardhouse for a particular period of time. While an offender committing any serious crime like terrorism or trafficking should be provided with life imprisonment or a death statement. Furthermore, officials should develop room for the culprit to learn community services which may change the prisoner's attitude towards its work.

In conclusion, the jail and its rule should be made strict and all the harsh environmental elements should be eliminated so that the criminals develop a feeling of positive attitude. Also, punishment and rehabilitation should depend on the type of crime committed.
