The relationship between language and culture is like that of a chicken and an egg. When people speak, they are essentially expressing their cultural values verbally. In my opinion, it is impossible to learn a language "properly" without also becoming familiar with the social and cultural context of the people who speak that tongue. I hope to provide evidence for my claims in the following essay.

Some people are able to master a dialect without ever investigating the customs of the people who speak it. They likely have a natural aptitude for linguistics and would succeed under any conditions if they put in the time and effort. Yet for the majority of people, studying in a social setting is the key to acquiring a second language properly. There is so much more to speech than just how we talk to one another. It's several things at once: an art form, a science, a way of life, a sense of self, and a way of seeing the world. It's a standard of living. Changing your perspective is like getting new spectacles. The Eskimos, for instance, have 24 words for snow, including "aput" (ground snow) and "gana" (drifting snow). Their vocabulary is more heavily influenced by snow than ours is, and their culture as a result. Understanding the significance of these concepts necessitates familiarity with their heritage and way of life.

Language has dialects, nuances, and idioms that can only be understood by immersing oneself in the culture and way of life of its speakers. The native language of the Punjabis, for illustration, is Punjabi. There are two distinct speech patterns, or dialects, in this area. Unless you spend significant time with the people who speak these accents or study their culture, you will never be able to understand or speak either of them. Nuances, or delicate shades of meaning, are another aspect of language that cannot be learned in isolation. In the end, it's more fun to study a new vernacular if we take the time to familiarise ourselves with the people and customs behind it. We're more interested in expanding our linguistic horizons.

In conclusion, I write to assert that knowing about the culture and lifestyle of people is unquestionably required if one is to learn a language effectively. It's a great way to have fun while getting a leg up on acquiring the language's subtleties and regional varieties. Knowing more about the country where the language is spoken will help us learn it more effectively.

Today's technologically-advanced society places a premium on those who demonstrate a hunger for intellectual growth by expanding their linguistic horizons. It has been argued that learning a language effectively necessitates familiarity with the customs and history of its speakers, while others have expressed scepticism on this score. But the earlier statement is one with which I wholeheartedly agree.

As a preliminary matter, some argue that understanding the background and customs of a speech is crucial to smoothly using it. This is because learning new words often requires familiarity with previously unknown concepts. Even a small change will introduce many false assumptions. While speaking with someone in a foreign language, for instance, one must give careful consideration to the words they choose. Misuse of a misspelling or misunderstood phrase could cause confusion among the native speakers of the language and disrupt communication within the country.

Additionally, in order to converse more precisely, one needs to have in-depth knowledge and awareness of the social traditions of a country, the way of life of the local people who reside there, and the traditional elements of the specific wording. Presenters should also take into account the cultural norms of the listeners they are addressing, and utilise appropriate slang and idioms when conversing with them. Hence, awareness of society's rules is prerequisite to mastery of the dialect. It used to be vital to learn about a culture before attempting to acquire a language, but in today's globalised and autonomous world, that's not the case. They may simply translate and interact with others of any language thanks to today's translation softwares and applications.

In recapitulation, learning a new language and becoming fluent in it is less significant than learning about the environment, history, and way of life of individuals in that nation. Moreover, novices should make it a point to do so right away. A language's acquisition is easier, in my opinion, when one is familiar with the country, the customs, the rituals, and the manner of life of the people who use that tongue.

Learning a language can be simple, but communicating like a native speaker and understanding that language can be difficult because it requires more than just learning words and grammatical rules. It has been scientifically proven that people frequently mean completely different things than what they say, and even the slightest change in our tone changes the meaning. I completely agree with the viewpoint that in order to truly master a language, one must first learn about the country in which the language is spoken. Without understanding the cultural, historical, and social aspects of the country, one cannot truly master a language.

To initiate speaking a foreign language, people must first learn its grammatical aspects and vocabulary, and then practise it for at least a year. On the contrary, we learn our mother tongue from our surroundings, including our parents, teachers, and relatives, as well as from life experience. We understand when to use an expression, sarcasm, shorten our vocabulary, and avoid a word. This all seems natural to us because we learned it through experience rather than books. However, in order to properly learn a foreign language, we must first learn about the people and their lifestyles. For example, I had many Spanish-speaking friends at school and took three Spanish classes. I can communicate and express myself in Spanish, but if you ask me how much I know about this language, I would say almost nothing. This is due to my lack of knowledge of the Spanish people's cultural and historical aspects.

Secondly, when people migrate to a different country, they learn to communicate in a different language. I personally know many people who can speak English fluently after migrating to and living in an English-speaking country. Some of these people were even less educated, but because they were exposed to the culture, lifestyles, and environment of an English-speaking country, they picked up the language. According to my experience, the learning process of a language can be accelerated when someone is exposed to the country and its cultural aspects where it is spoken.

In conclusion, learning a language requires knowledge of a country, its citizens, history, lifestyle, cultural, and traditional aspects. We learn better by doing rather than reading about something, and this is also true when learning a language. A language is easier to learn when we know about the people and countries who speak it.

Many people worry about whether or not people who are learning a new language should also learn about the country. Some people say that understanding the culture and way of life of the local people is an important part of learning a language, but others disagree. As for me, I agree entirely with the first.

The following are some of the reasons why people tell students to learn about the native cultures. First of all, it will make students more interested in their studies. Some educators find it boring and time-consuming to just memorise words and grammar rules. Instead, they are more keen on discovering about foreign cultures, such as how people live and what kind of music they listen to. When individuals like a country's history and culture, they are willing to put in more work on the subject.

Second of all, knowing how humans live and how they talk helps with communicating with native speakers. To better understand the language, speakers should be able to use or understand the right slang and idioms in sentences when expressing their thoughts. This can only be done by gaining knowledge about the culture and the way people think. But some people claim that it's a waste of time to look into things that don't matter. A lot of them think that they will never go to other nations, so they don't need to know what makes them unique. For example, some learners require a language class just to make themselves more employable, since speaking more than one language is a plus when looking for a job. So, they only need the most basic language skills because they don't want to waste time in class on things that don't matter.

To sum up, I believe it's crucial for people to learn about their cultural background and historical traditions because it can make studying much easier.
