The punishment of adolescents for committing crimes is undeniably a contentious matter that has been debated by various elements of our society. I believe they should be punished in the same manner. This is a viewpoint with which I strongly concur. I recognise that young individuals over the age of 16 face major penalties for their activities, in my opinion.

To begin with, crime is so awful that punishment was implemented to keep people safe and better their lives. This gives people who perpetrated atrocities the opportunity to reconsider their actions and possibly choose the right side. Teenagers are encouraged to commit crimes in these settings because they know they will receive a reduced penalty. In a country where drugs are banned, for example, a young man sold something similar, and it wasn't his fault. As a result, regardless of age, adults and children should be penalised equally.

Second, they will discover that their misbehaviour was cruel after punishment. That, in my opinion, is the fundamental reason why not only adults but even young people must go to prison after committing crimes. The greater the penalty, the better for the children. I support the opinions of countless others who have done similar offences. It would also be beneficial to have the same laws all around the world in order to limit the number of cheaters.

In conclusion, because young individuals already understand how a person should behave in society, they must be held accountable for their crimes as adults. However, measures to assist teenagers in leading honest lives when they are released must be put in place.

Nowadays many people are observing, that the number of minors committing major crimes is increasing. Some people think that teenagers who commit crimes should be punished like adults. I completely agree with this viewpoint. When juvenile offenders are considered adults and are sentenced to the same punishment, it will have a major impact on other juvenile offenders too.

In many countries, youth are subject to less severe punishment when compared to adults. This gives young people the green flag to do what they want without being held accountable for their actions. In India sometimes, teenagers go unpunished even for the most serious crimes. So if countries implement consequences for youth, they will think twice before breaking the law. Second, some adolescents with particularly aggressive behaviour need to be excluded from society and receive specialized psychological care this will indeed help to prevent such disastrous crimes in the future.

Increasing the severity of punishments will deter other teenagers from committing crimes. In other words, potential young offenders will fear committing a crime because they will be aware of and fearful of the severity of the consequences. This can benefit society and youth in the long run. Regardless of age, a crime is a crime; if minors are given leniency, they will not be aware of the harm they are causing to society. For example, if a college student stabs someone and walks away, he will not understand the seriousness and consequences of his actions.

In conclusion, the problem of increasing juvenile crime can only be solved by providing appropriate punishments regardless of their age.

In some regions of the world, youth-related crime is increasing. Therefore, some say that children who commit severe crimes should be punished in the same way as adults. This perspective is wrong in my opinion because it exposes adolescents to the corrupt influences of the world.

Firstly, the adolescent years are significant turning points in everyone's lives. They are influenced by violent films and lose the ability to discriminate between truth and fiction as a result. Due to the fact that heroes are admired even after committing a crime, they have a tendency to associate with the wrong people and engage in activities that they must subsequently undergo. They lack advice from their parents and elders as a result. For instance, according to a survey conducted by The Times of India, more than 50% of the criminal activities done by adolescents mirrored the actions shown in movies and video games.

Criminals must be punished because they convey the incorrect message to society, but these adolescents should be given a second chance and compensated by society. They should be sent to rehabilitation clinics where they will be taught life-improving skills and techniques. They must be taught the law and how to be responsible citizens. The government should organise all of this at a facility that can alter a child's outlook.

In conclusion, teenagers who violate significant laws should not be punished as severely as adults and in my opinion, this viewpoint should be promoted as punishing them can have adverse effects on youth.

Youth misconduct is on the rise in many communities. Some people nowadays emphasised that young people, regardless of age, who committed horrific crimes, should be severely punished. This essay contradicts the above viewpoint, and the reasons are given in the following lines.

First, it is not fair that youths who violate important laws receive the same punishment as adults. Many young people do not have the same experience as adults and do not fully understand the law and legal procedures. Therefore, it is unfair that these children are punished the same as adults. For example, it would not be appropriate for a 16-year-old child convicted of physical assault or murder case that endangered her friend's life to receive the same sentence as an adult convicted of the same crime. Therefore, juvenile offenders should not face the same punishment as adults.

Additionally, teenagers who are punished as adults may suffer unfavourable consequences in various aspects of life like schooling and education. Adults who break the law are often sent to prison, which can have devastating effects on young children who may be the target of other crimes committed by criminals. For example, in Canada, young criminals are placed in juvenile halls to protect them from the influence of adult offenders. Therefore, when juveniles are convicted as adults, they may be adversely affected by other crimes.

In conclusion, I don't think adult punishment is preferable because some children simply imitate their own example and need their father's direction to regulate this behaviour. Instead of punishing them, the government can organize counselling and awareness services for them.
