

Do you agree or disagree with the following statement? People are never satisfied with what they have; they always want something more or something different. Use specific reasons to support your answer.

Give reasons for your answer and include any relevant examples from your knowledge or experience.

You should write at least 250 words.

People are never satisfied with what they have - 8 Band Score IELTS Model Essay

In today's generation, people have a greedy approach and way of thinking regarding everything. The worldly desires and needs of human beings are never-ending. They are insatiable and desire more and more, as well as something distinctive. I agree with the statement that people are not satisfied with their existing possessions and want more.

Every person has a feeling of dissatisfaction at some point. Whether it's financially, emotionally, or in their jobs, even in routine life, there are small events and words said by them that prove how people are not satisfied with what they possess. This need and desire to achieve more and more begin at a young age. Another reason for feeling like this is the consistent comparison done among friends, family, or anyone in general. Comparing your possessions and achievements causes them to be dissatisfied with their situation.

This also serves as motivation and a driving force for people to work hard at achieving their goals. This is a beneficial characteristic. It keeps a person ambitious, wanting to achieve and gain more than what they have. The desire to attain what others have is a natural human tendency. We often feel envious of what we do not have and feel the need to buy it just to feel content for a short while. The desire to achieve new heights and goals dies out once individuals feel satisfied with what they have.

To sum up, feeling unsatisfied about what we have and wanting to achieve something more or unique is better because that will keep pushing people to work harder and attain our objectives.

People are never satisfied with what they have - 7.5 Band Score IELTS Model Essay

It is a basic human proclivity to desire what others have instead of being satisfied with what they possess. They always want something new or different to stand out. I somewhat agree with the statement, as it keeps them striving to achieve new things. However, it can also lead them down the wrong path.

As said by an economist, "Humans are not meant to be satisfied; their desires and wants are unlimited." "It never ceases." There is always something that the other person has that we wish for. For example, my friend recently bought the latest iPhone, although she purchased her last mobile phone in August because her cousin got an iPhone. This proves that we are never satisfied with what we have. However, this is something that motivates one to work diligently and wholeheartedly. This feeling is especially needed in one's career because if one gets satisfied with what they have achieved, one will not go further in their professional life.

On the other hand, this is also a bane for society. The constant desire could also corrupt an individual's mind. They gradually lose their logical thought process and begin to think only about selfish motives and desires. This slowly leads to the person becoming involved in illegal and revolting acts. It can make them obsessive by nature as well as hinder their personal and professional lives tremendously. Because of the negativity that comes with this type of conduct, most people tend to avoid being around it.

To conclude, being dissatisfied with one's existing situation is essential to being ambitious, but it also has a set of negative effects on society. People need to be aware of what they wish for and whether it is feasible.

People are never satisfied with what they have - 7 Band Score IELTS Model Essay

While some people are satisfied with their situations as they are, most people will never be content. I believe people often crave things that they do not already possess. They have the misconception that the things that belong to other people are of superior quality to their own.

There ought to be something out there that is better than what we own. This is the major reason why the majority of people are never content with their current situation. They have the impression that what another person has is better than what they have themselves. Therefore, people's thirst for more things continues to grow. To achieve a state of contentment, we must first acquire all that we do not already have, up to the point where there is nothing more that we could potentially want. But is that attainable?

Furthermore, human needs and desires are boundless and never-ending. As the proverb states, "The grass is always greener on the other side of the fence." A person always believes that what they have is less than another's possessions. It helps people progress further in life. For instance, my cousin, who lives in London, had no vehicle before. He always wanted a bicycle, but after buying it, he wanted a motorbike. And it continued until he bought a car. His desire to buy something bigger and better pushed him to work hard and earn money.

To sum up, I am certain that people's desires are diversifying all the time. Due to this, we won't have the opportunity to become bored, a person also needs improvement to survive in the modern, highly competitive environment.

People are never satisfied with what they have - 6.5 Band Score IELTS Model Essay

We have already come to accept materialism as the norm. The one thing we all agree on is that we desire more of it. But even when we have everything we need, there seems to be a desire for something even more. I agree with the statement that people always yearn for more, even after they achieve something.

There is always the lingering feeling that there may be something available that is better than what we have. This is how humans are intended to be. Even though it may sound terrible, it is in our basic nature to be constantly on the search for something more. Perhaps the primary source of a person's discontent is ambition. Our desire seems to have no limits. Being ambitious, we work even harder all the time to dominate nature because then we can control it more. Humans are inherently ambitious, and because of this, we are never satisfied with our performance.

The desire to have more than what we have begins at a young age. At younger ages, the children yearn for new toys and things to play with and show off to their friends. They play with it for some time and then want another one after seeing an advertisement or a friend's toy. As we grow older, our desires become less materialistic. The children yearn to make their parents proud and to receive recognition from their idols or role models. Once we attain maturity, our goals and desires become family-oriented instead of coming from our sole perspective.

To sum up, people's tendency to want more and more never ceases; they always desire something more and something unique and create a different identity for the rest.