Language is a structured system of communication. It represents the customs, traditions, lifestyle, and history of the place. There are numerous languages used across the globe, with some being used extensively while others are disappearing as a result. This affects society both positively and negatively.

When numerous nations speak similar languages, society benefits greatly. Obviously, it is preferable to employ one main language as a bridge language, as it strengthens intercultural communication. Speaking a standard language may be favourable for professional life in certain situations since it makes it simpler to do business with or work for multinational companies because difficulties at work can be discussed in detail and handled. Furthermore, effective communication is the cornerstone of international markets. For instance, workers who are more proficient in English are more successful in their field of work because they can interact with their coworkers more effectively than those who are not.

I believe that a nation is recognised by its culture and traditions. And the best device to learn them is the language of the nation. The best example is a collection of historical transcripts of Arab history, which depicts the country's history and customs. Translations into another language may stray from the original story. This leads to cultural invasion, making the host country lose its culture. Therefore, it is important to save these languages to preserve the identity of the nation and its residents.

To sum up, even though some languages are becoming more important and others are becoming less important, this has made global trade and unity possible, but it has also made it harder for cultures to keep their own identities.

With the advent of globalisation, there have been a variety of alterations. One of these is the use of language. Few languages, such as English, are now widely spoken throughout the world, significantly reducing the use of several regional languages. I feel that the use of selected languages is beneficial not just for economic prosperity but for the world's harmony as well.

Using a globally used dialect enables inter-continental unity. When the two parties communicating speak a common language, the flow of conversation is smooth and steady. When people are able to understand one another, they do not feel insecure and uneasy. Another advantage of using a globally accepted language is reducing unemployment. It creates better future opportunities and helps them get placed. For instance, a statistical report published by a well-known newspaper organisation reveals that the number of students who benefit from learning English as a mandatory subject is increasing.

Further, one more advantage is the increased opportunity for business expansion. It is possible because English has become an officially accepted language internationally. Nowadays, the mode of communication in the corporate world is inclusive of emails, text messages, and phone calls. Having no language barrier is beneficial because it enables a smoother discussion and deal. Moreover, it is promoting international investment in local markets and helping the economy progress. For instance, multinational companies are investing in and merging local companies in India, helping them to become more profitable.

To sum up, few languages have gained popularity. Although it has resulted in the disappearance of some languages, it is a positive development as it helps people worldwide unite as well as achieve economic prosperity.

In recent times, a few languages like English, French, and so on have gained tremendous attention, while a certain number of other languages are losing their place. Even though having a common language is good for society, it is also bad in some ways.

A language barrier brings in certain insecure feelings inside an individual; it makes them question their presence in that particular region, and so on. A common language reduces their hesitation and uneasiness. It has enabled the presentation of ideas and views globally to a wider audience that can understand them. It promotes cultural exchange and helps in multilateral exchange due to easier communication. For example, after the Vietnamese companies adopted English as their mode of communication, their profitability and trade scale internationally increased by 25% in the first year itself.

On the contrary, minor and regional languages are disappearing due to this. This is harmful to culture because language is the representation of cultural identities. For instance, India has over 200 languages; however, only the major ones, such as Hindi, Gujarati, Marathi, Tamil, and so on, are used. Even English, an international language, is given more importance in comparison to the regional languages. A place can be best known and understood after learning its language. Language is something that can give people a sense of belonging and brotherhood. If it is lost, the diversity, history, and identity of a culture die.

In conclusion, a single language is important to cooperate, trade, and exchange resources; however, it cannot be at the expense of another language.

The Earth is a global village, which we are a part of. There are various types of communication methods used by humans; the most common is speech. There are interactions among people from different parts of the world, which is possible due to some languages being spoken more and more while others are being abandoned quickly. I believe it is both positive and negative progress.

The prominence of global languages like English guarantees that societies in which there were just verbal dialects or very little written material before have a higher degree of literacy. Another such benefit of global languages is that they enable enhanced understanding between countries. It is not just beneficial for countries but for individuals as well, which helps them in their education and jobs. Further, a common language is also useful for the growth of the economy. With fewer barriers between dialects, the flow of conversation is smoother, enabling trade to flourish between nations worldwide.

On the other hand, the disappearance of local dialects will have a severe impact on traditions and values. All of the traditions and history are passed down from one generation to the next via the use of books and tales, which are best conveyed using the regional dialect. The history of the ancient tribes will be dissected by the globalisation of English. Every custom in India is linked to songs and celebrations, which heavily rely on jargon and proverbs. Yet, the main appeal for travellers is these cultural differences. People won't feel obligated to travel to a nation with an identical heritage and history.

To conclude, while having fewer languages is advantageous, it will result in too much loss. Local languages hold equal importance, as they represent our culture and heritage.
