Some people think that a sense of competition - Band 8 IELTS model essay

Many people think that it's important for kids to develop a feeling of competition, while others think it's more important to focus on teaching kids how to work together. It's essential to teach kids how to cooperate with one another, in my opinion, and this lesson will also cover all sides of the argument before reaching a logical conclusion.

On the one hand, demonstrating to children the importance of teamwork and encouraging them to work together might be beneficial to the growth of their personalities. This is because participation in group activities has the potential to improve a child's communication as well as their "soft skills," which include their capacity for empathy. In addition, participation in group activities may encourage young people to participate in volunteer work aimed at elevating community standards in the areas in which they live.

On the other side, there are many who hold the belief that healthy rivalry may be beneficial to the development of a child's character throughout the course of their childhood. A child who is taught from an early age to put in the maximum effort will give their greatest performance when placed in a highly competitive setting. In addition, participation in competitive activities may improve a child's capacity to continually expand their existing skill set. As a consequence, people specialize in activities in which they take pleasure and look forward with vigor to opportunities to demonstrate their mastery of such activities.

In conclusion, even though many people argue that encouraging students to compete with one another will teach them to be conscientious employees. From a personal position, I truly think that getting youngsters engaged in group initiatives will help them develop multiple qualities that will enable them as they grow up to contribute back to their community and society.

Some people believed that young people's competition needed to be stimulated. I continue to believe that children who are taught to support rather than resist their partners will grow into positive individuals.

First, those who supported the notion believed that in order for young people to succeed as citizens, they must provide enough aid to partners rather than resist them. Furthermore, adults' intentions toward the public are excellent if there is no longer a sense of conflict in them. Another benefit of this project is that when everyone is able to help each other, the biosphere functions properly, and civilization advances in all fields of engineering, medicine, and architecture.

Second, advocates of this point of view argue that students should be encouraged through the use of oppositional humor because this type of humor stimulates students' brains and gives them the ability to perform even better than their classmates when they are given a specific assignment in a setting that encourages healthy competition. In addition, this practice affords students the chance to broaden their horizons intellectually and cultivates the mental abilities they already possess. As a result, it is clear from the previous explanation that it is essential for children to carry out their work in a collaborative atmosphere.

In conclusion, both perspectives are valid in urging students to engage in friendly competition and mutual aid. In so far as my perspective is concerned, I agree with the latter strategy indicated in the previous paragraph since, on the contrary, help is always needed in every sector of the country. For this reason, I will support the aforementioned proposal because it will benefit both the people and the country.

One of the topics that are regularly discussed is whether young people should be instructed to become more cooperative or more competitive members of society. In my perspective, both behaviors are necessary, but working together to achieve a common goal is much more important than being competitive.

On the one hand, I believe that encouraging collaboration and group work is quite advantageous and essential for a variety of reasons. Children are better equipped to learn from one another when they collaborate to solve issues, to start with. Second, engaging in cooperative activities teaches kids the virtues and behaviors of cooperation, which aids in their development into thoughtful adults even in future workplaces. In conclusion, cooperation is crucial for improving personality development and preventing the emergence of uniqueness.

On the other hand, to survive in an extremely competitive global world, it is imperative that we instill a healthy feeling of competition in our children so that they can thrive in this environment. The most obvious advantage of fostering healthy rivalry among children is that it helps them become more imaginative and open-minded, which, in turn, broadens the range of opportunities available to them in the future. Individuals also develop a greater sense of self-reliance and reliance on themselves as a direct result of coming to terms with the fact that no one else would fulfill their responsibilities in their place.

In conclusion, there are positive aspects to both working together and competing with others. However, I do agree that greater emphasis should be placed on encouraging children to work together.

Some individuals think that teaching young people with a more competitive or cooperative approach will help them become more capable adults. Both have advantages, in my opinion, but I believe that collaboration is more important than rivalry.

On the one hand, teaching young people how to cooperate with others is important since all of us live in a single community. As a result, we need to communicate and cooperate. To live in a community, everyone of all ages requires cooperative skills. Toddlers may use it to strengthen their bonds with friends and coworkers as well as learn how to collaborate with others. Working in a group can sometimes lead to disputes because of divergent viewpoints among participants. Infants can exercise emotional regulation through this procedure, which can also help them develop an open mind to the thoughts of others.

On the other hand, encouraging children to be competitive offers benefits, such as stimulating their creativity and motivating them to work hard in class so that they may obtain a high grade or get into a good school with a good reputation. However, a competitive spirit can lead to stress and anxiety in adolescents, as well as envy, selfishness, and distrust amongst friends or classmates. It can also induce students to behave in an untrustworthy manner. As a result, it is essential to instruct and encourage kids to make beneficial use of the competitive drive that they possess.

Ultimately, both cooperative and competitive strategies offer benefits. Even so, I absolutely concur that collaborative effort is more vital and advantageous than competition since it takes the participation of everyone for a community to advance.
