

SOP For Law Student - Sample 1

In this contemporary world, everything is considered light. People from different parts of the world think that nothing amounts to a crime. On the contrary, from small minor crimes to organised crimes, the crime rate is ever-increasing worldwide. To understand the society at large, how judicial systems work, and how law enforcement agencies implement the law, a Master's degree in International Law would be the right choice for me.

At present, the criminal justice system is criminal-oriented, not victim-oriented. The system needs open-mindedness and out-of-the-box thinking. Since the international court system follows an age-old process, it needs young professionals to conduct speedy trials and justice for the victims. To meet such global standards, I have decided to equip myself with the right skill set, knowledge and experience. The MSc in International Law is a full-time 2-year Master's degree program offered by the University of Oxford, England. Since this entire course is purely designed for lawyers and other human rights advocates, it delivers the most relevant topics along with practical experiences. Moreover, working with renowned researchers would help me handle sensitive cases and eventually mould me into a successful international lawyer.

The MSc in International Law course is well-structured, allowing students to develop critical thinking abilities and analyse the work across boundaries. Here, students like me will gain diverse research experience, how to file a litigation, international court proceedings, and arguing skills. Apart from that, it focuses on various issues the world is facing. By the end of the first year, the students must have covered the coursework, examinations, and an official visit. It includes topics like advocacy, international and non-governmental organisations (NGOs), government policies, the media, the armed forces, medicine and other allied fields. These much-needed topics will prepare me for the world of an international court. Above all, the practical experience will give deep insight into human rights, criminology, and psychology irrespective of different cultures, institutions, laws and business practices.

My academic background includes one Bachelor's degree in Criminology and Criminal Justice Administration and one Master's in Psychology from the University of Delhi. During this period, I published five research papers at national and regional conferences organised by the O.P. Jindal Law School, Haryana and was awarded the "Best Research Paper 2021." And I gave a special lecture on "How organised crimes impact global economy?" to the Tamil Nadu Police Academy. Overall, I have gained knowledge about Indian Penal Code, Criminal Procedure, Indian Evidence Act, and other legislations for social protection in undergraduate and postgraduate. In Psychology, I learnt about topics like criminal psychology, delinquency, rehabilitation, reformation, etc. However, I must admit that I lack in areas that lead to combining all these fields and applying them in the present-day context.

If I join this International Law program, I will gain valuable skills, including verbal communication, excellent writing, time management and knowledge about law and legal procedures. Since the course description strongly emphasises international challenges and contemporary issues, I will acquire that knowledge from various legal practitioners. In addition, it will enhance my other skills like presentation, report writing, IT-related, and negotiation. And it will help me gain an advanced level of legal knowledge. On the other hand, it will allow me to do smartwork and team leadership, improve decision-making skills, and learn new technologies and technical suits like Microsoft office, design and writing.

Overall, this MSc program in International Law leverages one of the best study materials and resources for students. The comprehensive teaching and learning will ensure a good foundation for deserving candidates like me. Thus, this newer branch of subject, skills and experience will make me more enthusiastic and make a difference in my career. With that, I am sure I can carry a distinct approach toward learning and adding value to the discipline, university and the criminal justice system.
