Some individuals feel that wealth is the key to their happiness, and believe that the more money one has, the happier they will be. Everyone else believes that possessing a large amount of money ends up creating more complications than it resolves. I feel that as long as individuals receive sufficient money for essential necessities like food and a comfortable space to live, a massive proportion of surplus funds is likely to make existence less pleasant instead of more rewarding.

First and foremost, if you possess a lot of money, you have really no genuine desire to work or aim for anything. Moreover, rich individuals attract the inappropriate type of individuals. After a certain time, the wealthy start to realize that everybody around them wants just one thing: a piece of their wealth. This makes wealthy individuals afraid even of their honest, dependable connections.

Fear of losing one's wealth is another consequence of possessing a great deal of it. To keep out the entire world, the wealthy construct high walls and invest in high-tech surveillance systems. In addition, they become arrogant about the individuals that they meet, constantly fearful that individuals without money are possible thieves or scammers.

Due to these causes, I believe that owning a substantial amount of money is extremely harmful to happiness. It causes individuals to lose sight of the true sources of happiness, which are frequently simple things such as family and friendship. Wealth inhibits people from perceiving the genuine value of goods, as they are only able to recognize their cost.

Presently, we have a little more resources to do business, enhance our assets, and predict a positive future, although this does not necessarily indicate we can lead to happiness. Throughout this essay, I shall try to demonstrate that possessing a significant quantity of wealth does not constitute a source of pleasure.

There have been numerous explanations that prosperity and enjoyment tend to move off from each other. It can become a nuisance because everything around you is the result of anxiety and emotions of suffering. Moreover, if the sole objective is to gain additional income, it can be extremely simple to suffer a flip and loss in profit in a short amount of time. The discomfort associated with possessing big monetary amounts is a result of having to expend more of it in order properly secure, such as the cost of defensive purposes and additional payments to store cash in financial institutions.

Due to scarcity and threats, humanity has evolved. People require motivation as the longer we do not improve, the more likely we will become lethargic. This is the major motivation we are unable to evaluate happiness and prosperity, as the way our minds operate somehow doesn't change based on our economic state. In addition, happiness displays itself in a wide range of ways, such as the fact that possessing all and also being capable of sharing it with other people provides much more happiness.

In conclusion, money can provide all kinds of artificial and materialistic demands, however, it is not the cause of our sense of peace. There is nothing in the universe that really can substitute a family meal or family time.

Wealth does not necessarily guarantee happiness - Band 7 IELTS model essay

Wealth does not necessarily bring happiness. Considering the fact that money is crucial, I partially believe this statement; however, it does not guarantee peace of mind.

Initially, wealth is essential in life because we simply cannot live without it. Essentially, assets enhance our relationships, wellness, and career. First and foremost, money helps you build and preservation of relationships since it enables you to reward your colleagues, offer beautiful presents to your partners, and care for your family. Then, you may have used your money to employ a personal physician to supervise your condition, and you can also have a healthy balanced diet. Eventually, you will also have numerous opportunities to access the modern education system that is based on your income.

Furthermore, money does not guarantee satisfaction as a result of a horrific disease. First of all and importantly, if you suffer from a mental disease, such as an anxiety problem, you will continuously be concerned about things that don't deserve anxiety. Because of this, you cannot make a full recovery from your psychiatric condition even if you possess a substantial amount of money because you're unable to live an enjoyable life. Therefore, if you miss particular physical elements, such as your feet, you cannot spend your money to purchase normal legs like other people. Humans will never settle with the quantity of money they possess, so even if you are fortunate, you will continuously be worried about wealth, humans will always desire more and more profit, which will continue unless they realize that it is too late to find happiness.

To sum up, I feel that money is crucial, but it is not a guarantee of happiness, and it is important to discover ways to enjoy life even if we are not wealthy.

It's indeed correct that happiness does not always equate to financial success. Happiness is something that rejuvenates our minds and brings us immense pleasure. Many individuals believe that happiness embraces wealthy individuals with welcoming hands. This however is incorrect. Wealth can be utilized to buy overpriced premium products, but this does not assure that we're going to appreciate them. I believe that true happiness resides somewhere between satisfaction and serenity.

It really is clear that pleasure and economic achievement are still not necessarily linked. Joy refreshes our brains and gives us immense pleasure. Several humans think that joy spreads welcoming hands to the privileged. However, this really is misleading. Money can be employed to afford expensive luxury items, but this doesn't ensure that we will enjoy them. I feel that real happiness comes halfway between peace and calmness.

On the other hand, it is clear that money is required to make up for the shortfall. However, the concept that wealth is the most essential part of pleasure seems to have no merit. A person can purchase a luxurious and costly car, and a house with several conveniences, but he could still purchase a sound sleep. The same holds true for enjoyment.

It can be derived through the saying "Money makes the horse run", to some extent, accurate. Wealth is not everything, however, it is something. Real pleasure lies not really in money but in our decisions and behaviours. Therefore, humans must always aim to be fair in all activities, because doing so will increase overall satisfaction.
